DAVID PELLOW

UC Santa Barbara

The grassroots environmental justice movement and the field of environmental justice studies have evolved in creative and inspiring directions over the years. Recent work focuses on the challenges of envisioning and realizing abolition, confronting anthropogenic climate change/disruption, and articulating transformative approaches to achieving ecologically healthy and socially equitable policy-making for a “just transition.” This presentation considers what each of these areas of scholarship and politics could signal for the future of environmental justice and for advancing grounded and uplifting frameworks for regenerative development. Audience Q&A will follow. Live closed-captioning and Spanish interpretation will be provided.

David N. Pellow is the Dehlsen and Department Chair of Environmental Studies and Director of the Global Environmental Justice Project at UCSB. His recent books include What is Critical Environmental Justice? and Total Liberation: The Power and Promise of Animal Rights and the Radical Earth Movement.

Sponsored by the IHC's Regeneration series
